In this talk, the role of social hierarchy (e.g., power) in shaping consumer behavior and action is examined. Drawing on a variety of research findings, it is proposed that a good portion of the effects of social hierarchy on behavior can be understood through the lens of agentic versus communal orientations. Implications for consumer behavior and persuasion are discussed, as well as broader implications for human thought and behavior.