Emotions are a fundamental aspect of organizational life – they characterize our experiences, direct our focus, and guide our attitudinal and behavioral reactions. Despite the recognition that experiencing unfairness in the workplace is inherently emotional, scholarly attention on justice issues has been dominated by a focus on the cognitive landscape of these experiences whereas emotions have been “underemphasized and underappreciated.” In this presentation, I highlight the pervasive and influential role of emotions and how delving into the emotional landscape can open new research questions within the domain of organizational justice. In addition to her research, Dr. Barclay will also be discussing the various strategies for publishing in the Journal of Organizational Behavior from her experience as an Associate Editor.
