Despite the recognition that experiencing (un)fairness in the workplace can be an emotionally laden experience, justice scholars have only just begun to disentangle the relationship between emotions and (in)justice. In this presentation, I argue that emotions can play a ubiquitous role within the context of organizational justice.