Sexual harassment typically has little to do with sexuality – more often than not, it’s about gender. This talk will highlight new findings on gender harassment: conduct that disparages employees of one gender/sex but implies no sexual pursuit. This harassment, I will argue, puts pressure on all employees (not only women but also men) to conform to a narrow standard of gender “appropriate” behavior. As a result, gender oppression is maintained in society and replicated on the job.