I present the results of several studies showing that thinking may be grounded in everyday physical experiences of consumers. I show examples of when physical experiences can cloud consumer judgment, and when physiological experiences can serve as a resource and help consumers accomplish long term objectives. I also discuss the role the body might play in disbursing resources over time.