The Allen Building was the home of the Spiral Ridge Cyclotron Laboratory which brought in millions of dollars to the Department of Physics in research grants and employed nearly fifty people. Among its many research accomplishments, the laboratory was the first research station to successfully accelerate negatively charged heavy hydrogen ions in a cyclotron and control the direction of their spin. The laboratory has since been decommissioned, but remains beneath Parking Lot A.