The Tier Building was the first departure from the red-brick, Georgian architectural style prevalent on campus prior to the 1930s. The architect, Arthur A. Stoughton, was the Head of the School of Architecture at the time and his students drew up the plans. Stoughton was influenced by the Collegiate Gothic style that was common on many university campuses and utilized native Manitoba limestone for the building’s exterior and marble in its interior.