Even before he graduates, Andrew Vercaigne is growing a network to benefit his career. A volunteer ambassador for the Faculty of Agricultural and Food Sciences, he gains valuable insight from industry partners: What are they looking for? What’s exciting in the field today? He’s also forging friendships with other students at faculty events as they navigate this evolving profession.

“My advice to students starting university would be to get involved! There are so many great opportunities to meet new people. I have met some of my best friends by getting involved in student groups and participating in faculty events. The people you meet become relationships that you will embrace for the rest of your life and the experiences you have with those friends will teach you even more.”

Fifth-year Science student Kirsten Fleury found a supportive community on campus by getting involved as a student researcher and joining student groups. The female co-president of the Metis University Students Association, she is also an aspiring family physician set on breaking down social inequalities in health care. She realized how important it is to put her own well-being first, having faced difficulties with mental health.

“I struggled with balancing the stress of life, school and health. It’s important that as students we learn it’s okay to not be okay. Reaching out for help, and getting involved in my culture were the best decisions I made. I’m thriving this year, now that I’ve learned new coping skills, management tools and have the support of the Indigenous community.”
As a U of M student, you will be part of a culturally rich and diverse community where you have the opportunity to meet faculty and students from around the world, explore unique perspectives and take on new pursuits.

Playing sports has always been a big part of my life but I know the same opportunities aren’t available to everyone. I’ve witnessed the barriers for participation in physical activity for women, particularly in my culture, which has been a drive for me to improve this issue.

I am so lucky to be part of a cohort that is diverse, supportive, encouraging and who genuinely wants to see others succeed. This supportive environment has allowed me to ask questions, take risks, learn and grow.

Emily Hyde enjoys learning alongside classmates who one day will be colleagues. When she sees a need, she acts. As co-chair of the Graduate Nursing Students Association, Emily created a mentoring program for undergrads that will continue long after she graduates. And when the continuing education instructor saw a surge in patients struggling with addiction, she brought stakeholders together to educate about respectful care.
