COURSE DESCRIPTION

The “western” as myth, ideology, genre, marketing, or international export has been central, for better or worse, in framing cinematic understandings of landscape, settlement, community, and individuality within the larger tropes of “civilization versus nature”. Largely disregarded today, westerns have a trajectory as long and complex as that of cinema itself. This history includes early twentieth-century westerns with ethnographic and documentary value, the “B” westerns of the Hollywood prewar era, to the “adult westerns of the postwar era, and the “revisionist” western of the Vietnam and post-Vietnam eras. To this already diverse history must be added the important “boom” of the Italo-westerns, which included more than four hundred films produced in the 1960s and 1970s, often as Italian-German-Spanish co-productions, as well as the “socialist” westerns produced in East Germany. Even today the western retains an allure, whether as hybrids in films such as Sukiyaki Western Django, Cowboys and Aliens, the quotation rich Rango, or in more traditional productions such as the Canadian The English-man’s Boy and The Way of the West.

Westerns have, on the one hand, unabashedly promoted schematic clichés of masculinity, violence, racism, cultural hegemony, and American exceptionalism. On the other hand, they have explored complex issues of individual and national identity formation, economic and social struggle, processes and impacts of technological advance, structures of rural and urban development, the role of law as well as issues of justice and collective guilt. Narrative structure across this spectrum is often complemented by a rich and complex visual field encompassing images that have impacted contemporary understandings of landscape, environment, settlement, and even fashion.

This course will explore the complex history of the western. A series of films will be selected that provide an exemplary introduction to the topic, together with weekly required and suggested readings. Grades will be based on class participation, weekly writings, and on a final paper.

COURSE OBJECTIVES

This is an interdisciplinary course. Within this central framework, objectives are threefold: 1) to give students an introductory overview of the development and history of the “western” as a film genre; 2) to situate the historical trajectory of the 19th-century “west” (as represented in the western) in its “true” historical context; 3) to situate the “western” in its respective 20th-century contexts. All these will intersect the “art of seeing”; understanding visual media as a form of knowledge production set in a discursive visual, literary, and technological field. The interdisciplinary nature of the course is intended facilitate discussion across these three course objectives.
