Condensed Reality of Museums
in the New Millennium:
Beyond Meaning-Making

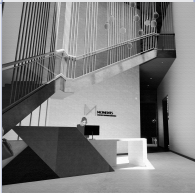

Studio Exhibition

“The new museum buildings in the Twenty-First century challenge the existing museum design approaches and demand a new definition; are they purely entertainment centres and revenue generators or are they spaces that encompass and condense our collective identity and reality for the education and betterment of the public from every stratum of society. Without doubt, museums continue to be cultural temples and reflect the architectural sensibilities of the time. However, the success of a museum should undoubtedly go beyond the building itself, and be measured by the quality and success of the exhibit space, where the visitors' thinking is stimulated and enhanced by the experience.”
